Bits and Pieces

Minowani

Prefix

This document contains the posts on minowani.github.io, for offline reading.

About

Welcome to this site, which I started to host Knowing.

Knowing was originally a talk basically on dependent-co-arising, but due to it's length and depth I was never able to finish. By writing it down one can now read it back and forth at one's own pace. Because I am not a writer, nor is english my native language, there are no doubt a lot of grammar and style issues. And a home for Knowing should allow me to make the updates swiftly and with ease, that is why I started the site. Over time there were some points I liked to address, some questions I did answer, which lead to more content.

At some point I had this thought: 'What I understand differs from how it is translated and explained, wouldn't the pāḷi be supportive?' so I started to translate some discourses, which lead to Paṭiccasamuppāda, the ebook. Seeing that translating does depend on one's view I decided to translate some more.

So here are my texts, which I would have preferred to read for myself decades ago. Unlike Knowing there is no real order to read them in, just pick what piques your interest. May they aid you on your journey to come to understand things for yourself. Should you have any questions, found errors, or just want to discuss, feel free to contact me: minowani on @tutanota.com.

Minowani,
03 January, 2025

PART I. Bits and Pieces

A Marble Floor

Suppose someone is helping a friend cleaning up their new house. A lot has been done already and only some floors are left to do. When their friend goes to the store for some groceries, they decide to start on the old hall which has a nice looking marble floor. After mopping the hall they take a break.

When their friend returns and, to their surprise, starts to clean the part which just got cleaned, they inform their friend they had already been cleaning there. When their friend explains that the marble is actually white and what they probably took as the pattern was is in fact dirt, they might look at the floor differently. Especially when seeing that, with the proper cleaning tools, these patterns do indeed come off. Thus now it is better understood what to do right? When they didn't see the dirt as dirt, they saw no problem in stopping where they did.

It is the same with the mind really. In the Aṅguttara Nikāya we find these two sermons:

> 'This shining, almsmen, mind. And that now is stained from visiting stains. That, not having learned, the commoner essentially not understands. Therefore, for the unlearned commoner, development of mind is absent I say.' (AN1.51)

> 'This shining, almsmen, mind. And that now is liberated from visiting stains. That, having learned, a hearer of what is noble essentially understands. Therefore, for the learned hearer of what is noble, development of mind is present I say.' (AN1.52)

So, in this way it is not a statement about the mind being beautiful as it is, perfect in its nature, that it only needs to be observed, or anything like that. A clean floor is still a floor. With a dirty floor it is about not seeing dirt as dirt, and thus lacking the knowledge, effort, skill, interest, etc., to attain to the job of removing the dirt.

Ājīva

Ājīva is often translated as livelihood.

And it certainly has to do with livelihood. In the discourses particulars of ājīva very often includes jobs. But also found are things like: 'With right doing, right ājīva; with wrong doing, wrong ājīva'. Thus a foolish person has, despite their job, wrong ājīva (AN10.105).

Then, to put a little less emphasis on just income while trying to incorporate life (jīva) we could use way of life, just like with ācāra and way of behaving. And it does connect:

With right view, right attitude; with right attitude, right speech; with right speech, right doing; with right doing, right way of life.

Ājīva [ā+jīva] way of life.

Ākiñcaññ a

Ākiñcaññ a is often translated as nothingness.

According to the dictionary ākiñcaññā means 'state of having nothing', 'absence of any possessions'. Nothingness, stating that nothing really exists, is nihilism; a wrong view involving a view of self: 'nothing really exists and thus neither does a self'. The sermons do show that with ākiñcaññāyatanaṃ (base for this "nothingness") there are perception and feeling and thus cognition, so there is that. Perhaps by focussing to much on the 'state of' part instead of the 'having' part it got shortened to nothing*ness* and thus lost meaning.

As a shorter alternative for this 'state of having nothing' possessionlessness or non-ownership would do, involving 'not self (anattā)' instead of 'there is no self'. Of course is a possession not you, your self, it is possessed, owned, taken up, which in turn can thus be taken down, abandoned, as well.

Ākiñcaññ a (nt.) non-ownership.

Anicca

Anicca is often translated as impermanence

You may have seen it in something that roughly goes like this:

> Is form permanent or impermanent?
> Impermanent.
> What is impermanent is that sufferable or happy?
> Sufferable.
> Is of that sound to say 'this is me, this I am, this is myself'?
> It isn't.

The answer to the last question might be clear when it is seen that if form were self it would be possible to have of your form 'be like this and not like that' and thus it wouldn't be liable to suffering (SN22.59). And regarding the first question you might find a reason to give the same answer as the first one. But for the second question the answer is not evident at all. It must be that the meaning of anicca has something to do with it. The dictionary does give some options, so let's see. Let's start by making two groups. Group A for impermanence and kindred words, and group B for some other options.

Now for group A. Many people already know that form, etc. are not permanent. And what is their answer to this? Live life to its fullest! Enjoy while it lasts! The negatives and the positives are seen as inevitable parts of life and one can only try to get as much of the positives as one can. And if they take this statement of things being impermanent to heart, then they would also be able to accept that there is no magical potion to make them everlasting, nor such a favour to expect from a deity, or from scientists finding a scientific solution, they won't have to worry about any possibility for those things to exist. So they can focus with an even lesser reserve to living their life to its fullest. The effect this impermanence has is not one that makes people want to turn away. Thus is the answer to the second question not evident at all, and this means that the sequence has become invalid.

Then for group B, let me explain it like this: Suppose you have in another country a family vacation home where you and your family are staying. It is entirely made out of untreated wood. So if someone tells you it is impermanent you can agree to it, even if you don't know what the question exactly was about. Was it that the house won't survive for generations, or the current woodworms? Or was it that you can't stay there long-term? It is after all not a permanent residence. In any case, either way you can agree. And so you give a thumbs up, especially since building a vacation home is part of your family's fun. So all is good. But suppose this person was an official and your reaction was not what he expected. Figuring his english wasn't good enough he signs his colleague to help him out. And you learn that apparently, because of old minings and the recent earthquakes, the area has become very unstable and evacuation is in order. Would you now enjoy your stay like there is no tomorrow or would you take your loved ones and evacuate? Why? Because the liability to suffering is evident. It doesn't matter to much if the experience is an enjoyable one, preferable it is but, safety first! Unstable for anicca is found in the dictionary, and with it the question 'Is what is unstable sufferable or happy?' is evident.

But it might be that the question 'is form stable or unstable?' may seem as if it has a similar problem, that the answer is not evident; why not an answer like 'sometimes stable, sometimes unstable'? If so, what do you think, would it be better to validate something as stable at face value or after investigation? So then, what makes it that f.i. a house is unstable? What you'll arrive at is its support. And thus we need to look at the stableness of that support. Anything that is supported, carried, by something which isn't stable, is not stable either. Now form is inclined. And what are the characteristics of the inclined? Arising, passing and the alteration when stood are known. And as these characteristics are inclined too, so they too arise... etc. (AN3.47). Looking at it this way we can now see why it must collapse; this whole structure is unstable. A principle of change for the worse.
The difference between these groups is not so innocent. Group A is about existence through time, about views connect with eternalism and nihilism; thus a container of wrong views. While group B is atemporal, structural, about depended-co-arising.

'What is unstable is therefor sufferable, what is sufferable is therefor not self and is thus not to be regarded as 'this is me, this I am, this is my self'.'

Anicca (adj.) unstable.

Citta

In the pāḷi texts different words are used which in english are often translated as mind. Those words are sometimes said to be synonyms. However, their specific usage seems rather consequently applied and I would like to see if we could keep those distinctions.

It is a bit like when a countryman asks you where you are from, and you might answer with a towns name. But when you are in another country and a local asks you where you are from, you might answer with a country name. Or, if you are from a well known city, the name of the city. It does depend on the context, and it does mean sometimes both can be used, but it doesn't mean they are synonyms. To me it is similar with mind.

Mind is used for citta, ceto, mano and viññana:

Citta

When we talk about the body and mind as duo, they are referred to in pāḷi as kāya and citta; so let's reserve mind for citta.

Ceto

Ceto is connected to the feeling side for which I use mentality, the heart. With then cetasika (belonging to ceto) as mental, like f.i. a mental feeling:

> Saññā ca vedanā ca cetasikā, ete dhammā cittappaṭibaddhā.
> 'And perception and feeling are mental, these principles are bound to mind.' MN44

Mano

Mano seems to be associated with doing, the acting side (e.g. manokamma), as in 'thinking-mind', 'doing-mind', for which I use intellect, the head.

Viññana

And for viññana I use cognition, from the Latin cognoscere meaning 'to know':

> Vijānātīti kho, bhikkhave, tasmā 'viññāṇan'ti vuccati.
> 'It cognizes almsmen, now therefor it is called cognition.' SN22.79

(For more information on this see Knowing.)

One for All

Intellect might feel a bit off when taken on as (being) intellectual, likewise mentality and (being) mental, but here they are just the distinctions as Mind, Mind-that-undergoes, Mind-that-does and Mind-that-discerns; it is just mind. And so, mind (citta) can be used for cognition (viññana) when it comes to cognizing, or for intellect (mano) when the emphasis lies on intention, but neither ceto nor mano contains viññana; they are not that freely exchangeable.

If you ask me, mind (citta) = mentality (ceto) + intellect (mano) + cognition (viññana).

> Ceto (nt.) mentality.
> Citta (nt.) mind.
> Mano (nt.) intellect.
> Viññana (nt.) cognition.

Dhamma

Dhamma can be found translated as law of nature, teaching, phenomena, qualities, ...

Translations for dhamma can sometimes be found in glossaries yet they may not get used in the texts themselves, this tends to make things a bit abstract and unclear. It can also have different translations in texts or be omitted which makes it not directly recognizable either. But it is just a word which would be ordinarily used by ordinarily people. By making it vague it is so abstract any-thing might do, yes even thing.

And what makes a thing a thing? What is the thing-ness in thing? If you ponder on this you might perhaps find that this thing-ness is based on law? blueprint? nature? Principle. And that is what dhamma means, principle. The teaching is a principle; a teaching is based on principles, it teaches principles. Law of nature; a principle. A basic truth; a principle. The essence of something; a principle. A theory or belief; a principle. No morals; no principles. All those different words in the texts which are used as translations for dhamma can be substitute with one word: principle. The usage of principle clarifies and makes it directly recognizable.

> Dhamma (m. nt.) principle.

Dhātu

Dhātu is often translated as element.

Element seems to be a proper translation. However it can be seen in a limited way, as chemical element or organic substance, while when I say ‘there is an element of danger to it’ it is immediately understood differently. And there are those dhātū like the beautiful, lustful, aversive, harmful, etc. (f.i. AN6.111).

To avoid confusion I use aspect instead.

> Dhātu (f.) aspect.

Dripping Soap

In AN5.3.8 we find the following comparison:

> ‘He overflows, completely flows, completely fills up, completely spreads this very body with pleasantness and happiness by means of seclusion. There isn’t anything, from all of the body, not spread with pleasantness and happiness by means of seclusion. Just as, almsmen, or an able barber or an able barber’s apprentice would knead, in a bronze dish, bathing powders with water, sprinkling around and around finishing a ball from oil, affected with oil, from the inside and outside spread with oil and does not drip.‘

I have always been intrigued by the last part of not dripping. Why would this matter? If you spread out pleasantness and happiness through and through, all over, why would dripping be a concern? Suppose you would paint a whole room, from top to bottom, ceiling, walls, floor everything; why would dripping on the floor matter? Not making such a mess that it piles up, just dripping. Besides... how would one even drip pleasantness and happiness?!

Today I washed my hands in a very tiny washing basin; the soap is on a shelf on another wall. So I wet my hands (closed the crane), picked up de soap, turned it in my hands a few times and was about to put it back when I noticed the soap water dripping. I turned the soap around a few times more, which made this soap water a bit thicker, so it wouldn't drip when put back. Then I thought about this sermon. The not dripping is not about not splashing it everywhere all around, it means it is to thin to work with; it can't be put in good use because it falls away. And it needs more of the same work first, to make it thicker, to be able to put it into good use.

Because of the oily ball part in that sermon, the instruction itself was not lost (to thin and the ball itself would fall apart). ‘Establish it‘ or ‘Establish it, else it is not workable‘ do not differ in ‘what to do‘. And there are more sermons stating the same (for example AN9.4.4 where a wise cow establishes her forefeet well before raising her hind feet in an unknown rocky area). Thus though it was not an issue, it is fun seeing this clarified.

Dukkha & Suffering

'Is dukkha not unsatisfactoriness rather than suffering?'

A treatment for an accidental early discovered severe sickness is not for the not yet manifested symptoms. It doesn't matter if we don't feel sick right now. Thinking a treatment would be just for that would be a misunderstanding.

Unsatisfactoriness and suffering (bearing of pain) are as scales of the same metric system and when entertained, untreated, symptoms like birth, ageing, dying, separated from loved ones, captivity, slaughter, torture are guaranteed; which is why birth shouldn't be even approved of (SN5.6).

And a translation should do just to all this. Since the noble eightfold path is the antidote, suffering is a proper and more beneficial translation. In other words, the divine life could be seen as an overkill for unsatisfactoriness. Yet suffering, while giving more a sense of urgency, should not be misunderstood as being exclusive; as if there would be only suffering (SN22.60).

> Dukkha (adj. --- n.) suffering.

Ekaggatā

Ekaggatā is often translated as one-pointedness, singleness, unification.

These translations are descriptions for what, in this context, we normally call focus. Focus reminds of holding a lens in such way the sunlight converges, unites, unifies, into a small area in order to create a burning mark or a fire. The light is then concentrated. Focus of mind (cittassa ekaggatā) is what concentration is (MN44).

> Ekaggatā focus.
> Cittassa ekaggatā focus of mind (concentration).

Kamma

Kamma is often translated as action.

Kamma has a (different) meaning outside our domain and this now finds its way in.

Kamma in our context does means action. And there are just these three ways in which we can do things: by body, by speech and by intellect. We can only do something just now right this moment and of course, what we do leads to result; we do something precisely because of an expected result. That the exact 'result' (the ripening of an action) is not found out is one thing, it is one of the four unthinkables, but that there is ripening is to be understood. Action is not a matter of believing.

Do yourself a favour and don't use kamma but use action instead, so that a misunderstanding is more easily spotted by yourself.

> Kamma (nt.) action.

Letting Go

Very often it can be heard one should not attach; one should let go.

I am not to found of this letting-go. Not that we should not let go, but without proper understanding I find it not to helpful. Often a very rigid letting-go is viewed. While there is the case were it can also be seen as ‘no worries’, ‘relax’, ‘just let it go’, which already make things lighter. Perhaps a more beneficial approach is not to take it as an instruction but seeing it as a result from developing understanding. The more wisdom is developed the more letting-go will naturally follow.

But it can work as a reminder. Before engaging or when separation sets in it can be handy to remind yourself it might not be worth the trouble to hang on to things-that-follow-their-own-agenda to such an extend they will cost you your own happiness. Letting your happiness depend on things you don’t have control over might not be the wisest thing to do. Unguarded this can still go the rigid way but perhaps it helps comparing it with enjoying a bird in the wild vs capturing that bird and put it in a cage so you can hold on to it even longer. The free bird flying away doesn’t come at the cost of your enjoyment at all, it does its thing and you can be happy about it even when that bird is already out of sight.

And this letting-go is not seen by others as a form of disinterest or anything negative, quite contrary, by letting go there is more room for kindness, generosity, compassion, etc. So just keep it light (loose) instead of heavy (attached). Be wise about it. Let it go… free.

Māna

Māna is often translated as conceit.

In the sermons we can find there are ten yokes. The first three are cut with stream-entry (the next two weakened by once-returning), the first five with no-returning, and the remaining five on virtuousness. Māna is one of those last yokes, so as long as we are not enlightened we have māna.

Conceit is excessive pride in oneself. But when we see someone acting selflessly would we then say this person is acting out of conceit? That feels a bit weird right? So how can we let this make sense?

'I was', 'I saw', 'I did', 'I want', 'I said', 'I feel', 'I think' , ... if someone would use these in several sentences within a short period of time, we could think that this person is really full of him/her self. We could say that he/she is 'making it about him/her self' hence conceit. But suppose someone was asked a lot of questions like 'Where were you?', 'What did you see?', 'What did you do?', then answering them with 'I was', 'I saw', etc. wouldn't automatically mean this person must be full of him/her self. So, conceit is more about 'making it about you while it is not about you'.
At stream-entry, once-returning and no-returning not-self is understood yet a sense of self is left (SN22.89). And this sense of self is regarding things which are not-self (pañc'upādānakkhandhā), so this too is 'making it about self while it is not about self'. In this way it got the characteristics of conceit, hence conceit. Conceit, arrogance, pride, etc., are manifestations of this principle of conceit.

Having that said, the dictionary also shows that māna can also mean honor, respect, and there is a third meaning in the form of measure. An english word which would cover all three meanings is esteem. The most subtle form is the esteem 'I am' (asmimāna). And this self-esteem is a form of measurement. Thus not only does esteem seem to fit better, it also steers a bit away from selfishness or ego to which māna might perhaps be reduced to. And it might be that esteem can more easily be associated with holding ('held in high esteem'). And what can be held can be let go of.

Māna esteem.

Mind is Matter

Some time ago I had my first few encounters with people claiming mind to be matter, as a product of the brain. I was then unaware of people having this view but the for me interesting part was to discover I had not questioned my own view on this matter at all. As long as I can remember I took for granted we have a mind, as the non-matter part of a being.

In support for their view they claimed to have gotten it from someone or somewhere else and asserted that with the right equipment we can see things lighting up in the brain, explained as the mind thus originating from the brain. Which to me is an odd conclusion. After all, what is looked at is matter (it is matter that is seen), how would this say anything about the non-matter part to begin with?

In terms of language mind and matter are two things, so there is that difference, but lets reason a bit further.

If two things are the same, there must be some sameness, at least within a certain context. A house differs from a store, so these are two different things. But on a more general level we can say that since both are buildings they can be seen as occurrences of a same thing. So we have two particulars (house & store) of a (more) general (building). A house differs from a cave and caves aren't necessarily called buildings, so to see if they are particulars of a same thing we would have to go to an even more general level. Then we might end up with something like shelters. In the end the highest form of generalization of matter is a combination of hardness, cohesion, temperature and motion. These four great essences can be discovered by us through our senses and to some extend they can be shared; the tree I see can be seen by others too.

Thus if mind is matter then it must be possible to generalize it with these same qualities as well. So lets take anger for example. When we are angry we know that. But is it tangible? Visible (does light reflect)? Can it be tasted? Smelled or heard? Can it be shared?

When someone is angry there often are signs to see but again, that is just the matter part not the anger itself. And it might become more difficult to notice things like knowledge, trustworthiness, and so on. We can see that any of those things do not behave what we know of matter to be like at all. Not discoverable through our five senses and not shareable, not having this sameness on a very general level, then thus not the same thing. And being different things they then can't be derived or originated from one another.

Now some might say 'Well, then it is all energy'. If energy is assumed to be an even more general level then care should be taken because sooner or later we think of atoms, electrons, etc. which is just matter. Also it would then open the view to 'matter is mind' while 'mind is matter' was really meant to deny any non-matter in the first place. And if you are willing to let energy to be just an abstract, without anything concrete, then the question remains 'to what end'?

Stating that mind is matter is really implying something about life-and-death, which in the end forms an excuse of why we live our lives the way we do. However we understand life to be, that forms our justification. In a way we could say the awakened one did view a more general level: suffering; but then gave us the antidote for it as well.

Nibbāna

Nibbāna is often left untranslated and/or is unclear.

Translations for nibbāna can sometimes be found in glossaries yet they may not be use as such in the texts themselves, this tends to make things a bit abstract and unclear. Or if an explanatory part is used (extinction, extinguishing, unbinding) it doesn't make it clear enough.

When it comes to translating nibbāna there are a few points to take into account:

1. It is a word which would be ordinarily used by ordinarily people. People do have a perception of what nibbāna is even when they don't directly know it for themselves.
2. It is seen as positive.
3. It has to do with stilling, stopping, specifically regarding greed, hate and delusion.
4. It is a highest goal; it comes after freedom, emancipation.

I use for nibbāna peace. Let's check with the points above:

1. People know what peace is, even though they might not have experienced it directly or fully by themselves.
2. Peace is seen as positive.
3. It can be understood that with greed, hate and delusion it isn't peaceful; then there is no real peace.
4. Freedom, but for what purpose? For doing what you like? Then you are not really free; but freedom in order to have ultimate peace? now that surely is the highest.

Many today's questions on nibbāna are not careful or valid. If instead of 'is nibbāna not boring?', 'is peace not boring?' was asked, it would already be easier to see that with boredom peace would be lacking. In this way this translation clarifies while covering the points taking into account as well.

> Nibbāna (nt.) peace.

Nīvaraṇā

A popular translation for nīvaraṇā is hindrances.

Language is a bit ambiguous so understand that they don't feel as a hindrance to you, quite the contrary, but they are showstoppers to wisdom.

There are these five obstructions:

1. Kāmacchanda
2. Byāpāda
3. Thinamiddha
4. Uddhaccakukkucca
5. Vicikicchā

1. Kāmacchanda

Kāmacchanda is a compound of kāma (lust) and chanda (desire) and stands for desire-with-lust or lustful desire. Desire with lust is what normally drives one to find happiness when engaged with the world, not when drawn back from it. It depends on improper attention to a sign of attractiveness (SN46.2). The more that keeps being fed, the more it grows. The analogy given in SN46.55 is about a bowl of water mixed with various dyes which when used as a mirror gives a distorted view. Thus when fed it consumes, obsesses, giving less room for more beneficial things. Under its influence we turn away from doing what is wise to do.

2. Byāpādassa

Byāpāda is an obstruction which depends on a sign of resistance (paṭigha) or friction if you will. With improper attention to this it appears and develops. The analogy given is about a bowl of water heated up which when used as a mirror gives a distorted view. The more heated up we are the less room we give for wise things. Heated up, out of friction, is generally an image for the display of anger. So lets call it just that.

3. Thinamiddha

Thinamiddha is a compound of thīna + middha. Thīna is to congeal, and middha is 'to be fat', torpor. They describe this one obstruction (not a conjunction; AN1.13). As obstruction it gets fed by the improper attention to things such as dislike or discontentment, weariness, yawning, drowsiness after a meal, mental sluggishness. The analogy given is a bowl of water covered up with weeds which couldn't be used as a mirror. Weed takes time to grow so one had no interest in keeping it tidy. Thus being bored or lazy; which makes you dull. Taken all together this obstruction seems to stand for that dullness. It wouldn't be to difficult to see dullness being a showstopper for wisdom.

4. Uddhaccakukkucca

Uddhaccakukkucca is a compound of uddhacca and kukkucca, describing this one obstruction. Uddhacca means something like agitation, excitement, and kukkucca bad doing, misconduct, bad character. Further is this obstruction fed by improper attention to mental unrest. Agitation over bad doings, fed by mental unrest, describes what we could call remorse. The analogy is a bowl of water being stirred (agitated) which when used as a mirror would give a distorted view. Being stirred with to much unrest to leave it alone. To busy crying over spilled milk which is already generally understood as not being helpful for anything, let alone wisdom.

5. Vicikicchā

Vicikicchā comes from vi+cikicchati, dis-reflect. The analogy says one can't use a bowl with muddy water in the dark as mirror. Thus a visual distinction can't be made. All look the same; without clarity, obscure, vague. When this as yoke is dealt with then there is that clarity and then there is no doubt. With doubt things might not be so clear, but at least they are clear enough to have doubt about them; they can be seen or considered (there is just no certainty about it) but when vague, lacking distinction, then as such it isn't even considered thus then there is not even that doubt. Unseen it will not be reflected on. This obstruction is fed by the improper attention to clarity lacking principles.

In common

These five obstructions are all fed (either to appear or grow) by improper attention:

- lustful desire by improper attention to a sign of attraction.
- anger by improper attention to a sign of resistance.
- dullness by improper attention to dislike, weariness, drowsiness, etc.
- remorse by improper attention to mental unrest.
- unclarity by improper attention to clarity lacking principles.

> Nīvaraṇā obstructions.
> Kāmacchanda lustful desire.
> Byāpāda anger.
> Thinamiddha dullness.
> Uddhaccakukkucca remorse.
> Vicikicchā unclarity.

Opportunity

In AN8.3.9 (Akkhaṇasuttaṃ) we find people thinking the world had a chance, an opportunity, to benefit from the awakened one, because he was then there in the world.

But we find the awakened one stating people mistake his being then there in the world for an opportunity. Even with him there, those in hell can't benefit from the principle being made clear, or animals, or some certain gods, or those living to far away, or those close enough but with to strong wrong views and to confused, or those simply to dumb to understand. For those it is a miss.

There is also the case when a person is capable but the principle has not been made clear, then too it will be a miss. Thus with the principle made clear don't miss out on the opportunity; study from the sermons so once in a while.

Parimukhaṃ

Parimukhaṃ is used in the context of ānāpānasati. It is found in the phrase parimukhaṃ satiṃ upaṭṭhapetvā and is a compound with pari (around) and mukha (mouth, entrance). According to the dictionary pari also means '(lit.) away from, off' and mukha 'face, entrance, front, top'.

Ānāpānasati is a compound of ānāpāna and sati. While sati is memory (mindfulness would be sampajañña see SN26.7) it is a bit unfit for the usage in english where recollection fits better. And ānāpāna is about the breathe not breath if that distinction helps. Recollection is something we need to develop and here we hone this on the breathe.

We are told to recollect on the breathe knowing whether it is in or out and long or short, and whilst knowing this train with body, feeling, mind and principles (SN54.1). Parimukhaṃ describes this way of attending (upaṭṭhapetvā). We can describe it as 'away from the front', 'around the front', etc. to indicate what is at the centre of our attention and what is at the side. Or at the foreground and the background. What we train gets to be the centre of our attention, the foreground, and the knowing of the breathe as in or out and long or short then surrounds that, as the context or the background. And this manner is covered by the english word peripheral, with peripherally (parimukhaṃ) being the adverb. Recollection of the breathe is a recollection on the breathe but advised is to develop recollection in full (SN54.6). By training with body, feeling, mind and principles while peripherally attending to the recollection on the in and out breathe neither background nor foreground are forgotten.

Parimukhaṃ (adv.) [pari+mukha] peripherally.

Perfections

Ever so now and then I hear about (the) perfection(s) and I would like to make a general remark.

Hearing perfection(s) some feel they then understand what needs to be done. However when one understands what needs to be done then one has entered the stream, till then things are not quite so understood. Now more things are not clear till they are but perfection has a ring to it of something pretty much flawless from each and every angle, or maxed-out; something quite out of reach. If you need to judge your own actions along what you consider to be perfect then it is seldom good enough.

To them I would emphasize the words good enough. Good enough for the goal gives some more room, air, right? Your conduct does not have to be perfect, just good enough. Your concentration does not have to be perfect, just good enough. Your wisdom does not have to be perfect, just good enough.

This is not just a trick to get some air in. In the sermons we see virtuous ones (arahants) behaving in a way which others saw as rude or careless etc. To those it did not look like the perfect behaviour at all. We also see the virtuous ones differ in concentration. Some had supernatural abilities, others not, yet their concentration was developed good enough. Likewise there were differences in wisdom, yet the developed wisdom was good enough to uproot not-knowing. Those developments were of a much higher degree than what is needed to enter the stream for which less conduct, less concentration and less wisdom are good enough. In any case, when good enough, well... that is just perfect.

Rebirth and Reincarnation

We don't need to consult many buddhist texts to read that according to them death is not the end of it all. Were it so a knife would then already have been a far more easier tool. Rebirth and reincarnation don't have this problem but share the idea that a certain something is carried over, or remains, from one life to another and that is there the problem.

Eternalism (sassatavādā) and nihilism (ucchedavādā) are two extreme (worldly) views on existence. Eternal is seen as lasting forever and thus must hold time as never ending (eternal) first. The breaking up, disintegration, perishing, of this existing-through-time is nihilism (existing-through-time until no more, is just a delayed version of it). Both rebirth and reincarnation are based on these misconceptions. — For something you have never experienced, heard of, etc. you have no name. If you do have a name it is for a certain experience, but when this is misunderstood the name includes the misunderstanding. Things can be remembered (SN22.79), thought out, perceived, yet misunderstood. Rebirth and reincarnation do not just indicate life after dead, they must also include a certain how. And depending on this how these views can be seen different or as synonyms, but what these outsiders' views didn't include is dependent-co-arising.

If rebirth and reincarnation were to be redefined to imply dependent-co-arising (a buddhist version of rebirth or reincarnation? why such horrible construct) it would still solve nothing. Rooted in wrong view they don't disentangle anything but build further on top what is not understood, it added another concept to the confusion thus requiring more explanation not less. — Like with eating. It doesn't matter how often you eat it stays eating (eating is eating). You wouldn't then suddenly re-eat, which would also require more explanation, not less; would it be about the vomit after a meal? This redefinition engraves and masquerades the already underlying wrong views, which now forms support for pernicious explanations like dependent-co-arsing with lifetimes. But dependent-co-arising explained as existing through time (across lifetimes, rebirth) still stays to be sassatavādā & ucchedavādā. — With rebirth and reincarnation beings are seen as reborn or reincarnated, yet beings are born. Both views, which are views of embodiment (sakkāyadiṭṭhi), must at least acknowledge birth. And it is precisely birth which is not being understood.

The discourses talk about birth, next birth, a following existence, etc.; translations as rebirth and reincarnation are here just translational liberties. And unlike them, birth is not just a view. Birth already includes the possibility for a next birth (birth is birth) for it too is dependently-co-arisen. Thus depending on the context the usage of birth, next birth, future birth, further existence, etc. will do perfectly fine; there is no need to seek shelter in wrong views. Two wrongs don't make a right.

The world fares towards extremes (eternalism, nihilism); it was the exalted one who taught by the middle and a middle simply can not be grouped with either extreme.

Sabbe Dhammā Anattā

> Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā
> Sabbe saṅkhārā dukkhā
> Sabbe dhammā anattā

A common explanation is that since the third line talks about dhammā, instead of saṅkhārā, it includes both saṅkhārā and asaṅkhārā. And Nibbāna, being asaṅkhārā, is thus included. But is this a valid inference?

A stream-enterer has understood anattā, then the last line is clear. Till then anattā is misunderstood (idem the others). To come to understand anattā we need to train. And what is there to train? In this context we can look at SN22.15 where is said that the five masses (khandhā) are unstable (anicca). And what is unstable is sufferable (dukkha). What is sufferable is not-self (anattā) and should be seen with wisdom as it really is: 'This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self (attā)'. Which leads to getting fed up and with being fed up comes fading. Through fading, liberation and with liberation there is that knowledge.

That the masses are unstable is here a given, a statement; it is here not explained. In order to understand we need to learn to see for ourselves how this is so, which requires a thorough grasping of their principle. When we understand the principle of f.i. matter, we can even say something about matter which we have never ever encountered before. To look at this principle we need to look for, investigate, a more general level. What do all manifestations of matter have in common? That what it is, is then its characteristics and all matter behave accordingly. Thus when wood is understood then to that extend all wooden things are understood. Likewise, when saṅkhārā are understood (as unstableness) then all dhammā are understood (as not-self). And that is what those three lines say. This way they can be seen as a very compact instruction.

But would that rule out Nibbāna?

By implying Nibbāna as being included, it must also imply unstableness (anattā is seen because unstableness is seen) and with unstableness suffering, which simply can't be. The line 'sabbe dhammā anattā' does not justify making such (atta or anattā) claims about the asaṅkhāta at all.

Saṅkappa

Saṅkappa is often translated as thought.

We got thoughts all over the path… it seems so vague.

What we can read is that there are the three right ones (nekkhammasaṅkappo, abyāpādasaṅkappo, avihiṃsāsaṅkappo) and the three wrong ones (kāmasaṅkappo, byāpādasaṅkappo, vihiṃsāsaṅkappo). We can think about renunciation, good-will, harmlessness but when we are actually (trying to be) harmless now that is a bit different. To me, saṅkappa means attitude.

With right view, right attitude.

> Saṅkappa attitude.

Saṅkhārā

Saṅkhārā is often seen translated as (volitional) formations, fabrications, etc.

It is certainly understandable how certain aspects of saṅkhārā got to be translated as saṅkhārā, but in doing so it also got a bit abstract and unclear.

Important is to remember that all what is grasped on as 'me, this I am, etc.' which do not fall into one of the other masses-with-grasping, fall into this one. And what do you think, do you sense you to be (volitional) formations or fabrications?

Saṅkhārā translates as inclinations. When we say one is wired in such way or one is of such or so character it relates to this mass. And when something goes against ‘how you are wired’, thus inclined, then you’ll quickly notice how strongly this goes against your ‘sense of being’, ‘you’.

For a more in-depth explanation on inclinations in the context of dependent-co-arising see Knowing.

> Saṅkhārā (pl.) inclinations.

Sīla

Sīla is often translated as virtue.

A virtue is a trait, quality, that is deemed morally good.

Would you consider right concentration to be a virtue? Or right effort? And what about right view?

I do, yet those are not sīla.

And what to think of bad virtue... a bad quality which is deemed morally good? This is rather strange right? Yet sīla can be good or bad.

If you ask me, sīla simply means conduct.

> Sīla (nt.) conduct.

Taking Refuge

Everyone thinks they are right, there is no one thinking they are wrong. When it turned out later you were wrong, you are then now right about being then wrong. And even if you think 'This action is bad, I shouldn't be doing this' it is mere a double right: you already know it is a bad action so you are right about that, and for some reason it is still the right thing for you to do now.

Basically you can't do things which on all levels are seen by you as wrong, which is already covered by the words right and wrong which do have some relation to you. We can't directly see our wrong view but we can try to understand it indirectly f.i. with the thought: 'I am not awakened therefore I must have wrong view' however, this comes from taking that view as right first; so you are then still, first right. Things are thus met with certain blindfolds on; they are in a blind corner and are not seen.

Taking refuge is basically resorting to another one's proclamation to see what is more true; it is like using mirrors to be able to see what is in your blind spot. When some asks in how far the principle is in agreement with science, it usually shows their refuge lies foremost in science. Or when concerned whether it is confirm their school, foremost their school. And refuge to the awakened one does have its own problems, for the question remains 'Which awakened one?' Some say the texts, within and across schools, are in contradiction, some argue it is all the same, in any case when taking refuge you still already decided what you hold as true first. A safer approach then is to investigate what you hold as true and then go by what you 'understand to be true for yourself'. Without accepting and denying things you don't understand, else you would just imply you do understand which just shows where your refuge lies foremost. It can be handy not to take to big chunks all at once but to work with smaller steps; the more you work with what you really know the deeper and wider your understanding grows. Till someday you can be your own refuge without the blindfolds on.

The Desire Paradox

'Isn't the desire to end desire a paradox?'

Suppose you grab a log and you caught a splinter. This splinter is a sharp foreign object and it would be wise to remove it (it could lead to an infection). To remove it we could make use of a (disinfected) needle. A needle is another sharp foreign object. So, we use a sharp foreign object to remove a sharp foreign object. Do you see any paradox in there?

We don't just stick a needle in there and leave it there too, that would not be skilful. When the splinter has come out that needle is easily cleaned and put away.

Desire or attachment to the path can be compared to the holding to (and skilful making use of) the needle. Letting go of that is more about implying what will be done, instead of something that you need to focus on as 'need to do'; skilful desire leads to the ending of desire.

Three Types of Dukkha

In the sermons (e.g. SN38.14, SN45.165, DN33) three types of suffering are named, but I have not seen them there explained. They are explained outside the sermons, but in so far I have seen them they led to weird implications. Let me then offer an alternative.

1. Dukkhadukkhatā

Dukkha due to suffering (dukkha). And what is suffering? Birth, oldness-and-death. This doesn't mean one must feel sorrow or have an unhappy life. One can be very happy and joyful in this life. The point is that when there is no security from them, sooner or later, grievous things will happen for sure.

2. Saṅkhāradukkhatā

Dukkha due to inclination (Saṅkhāra, see 'Knowing'). Sometimes people keep making bad decisions and suffer the consequences. It might seem as if they just can't help themselves, as if they are wired that way (inclined). They are more inclined to act out of greed, hatred and delusion.

3. Vipariṇāmadukkhatā

Dukkha due to change for the worse (vipariṇāma). We might get robbed, our environment may have to deal with severe weather conditions, we might get sick, our countries might get into war, etc. All these sort of things, when run out of luck (so to speak) or in case of force majeure, fall under change-for-the-worse.

Free from Suffering

Normally when suffering from a painful bodily or mental feeling both and a bodily and a mental feeling are felt. Which might give the impression of this inseparable blob of suffering. Even so, that is not what suffering is. Just like happiness is not defined by happy feelings (whatever happiness there is, that is the happiness), so is suffering not defined by painful feelings. A virtuous one can still feel bodily feelings (feelings are one of the five masses) but without the suffering that comes from being attached to it. Or to any of the other khandhā for that matter.

Then for a virtuous one there is no:

- Dukkhadukkhatā; Birth, ageing and dying has stopped; the deathless has been reached.
- Saṅkhāradukkhatā; Unwholesome choices can't be made since greed, hatred and delusion are uprooted; there is thus no such inclination.
- Vipariṇāmadukkhatā; Since there is no appropriation, no regarding 'things' as 'for me', or 'mine' or as 'happening to me', etc. there is no suffering depending on this.

PART II. Transicalities

About Transicalities

Here I address some pāḷi words I head to deal with while their meaning is for me not directly discoverable or is not unambiguously following from the context. They are not 'dhammā' and thus not showstoppers, but to which, because of some oddities, I could not commit to the known translations.

The inferences made here are based on the grammar and context, by looking at what could technically and logically fit. Now language doesn't need to work like that, however since these inferences did tackle the oddities while bringing up some positive points as extras, I decided to use them instead.

Sitting Cross-Legged

Sitting cross-legged has never been that clear to me. Is it about the full lotus position? Or that position where you sit with your knees up high? And doesn't this automatically devalue the half lotus position, or the position where you lay your legs bent in front of you, or sitting on a chair, basically by putting down this part of the instruction? My advise was not to worry about it and just sit stable. But now, while working on a translation, I had to deal with it. So far all the translations I have seen say the same thing. But lets see if an "alternative" without the instruction to sit cross-legged can be made.

'Idha, bhikkhave, bhikkhu araññagato vā rukkhamūlagato vā suññāgāragato vā nisīdati pallaṅkaṃ ābhujitvā...'

This usually gets translated into something like:

'Here, almsmen, an almsman gone to a forest, or gone to the foot of a tree, or gone to an empty home, sits down having bent the legs crosswise...'

To avoid sitting crosswise I need to look at the phrase 'pallaṅkaṃ ābhujitvā' . Pallaṅkaṃ is said to mean sitting cross-legged. It also means divan, sofa, couch, seat and it is used this way. To keep things consequent and uncomplicated lets try that here too then. And ābhujitvā is the aor.ger. of ābhujati and ābhujati = 3pers. of 'ā' + 'bhuja'. Bhuja can mean bend, with ābhujitvā then as 'having bent' or 'having folded'.

A quick peek (including outside the four Nikayā) learns that pallaṅka:

- Is used as something to sit on. So far I have not yet seen a conclusion it must be a manner in which to sit. Just like that in this context there is not spoken of a manner to keep your hands or eyes. There is spoken of a manner to sit as in aspiring, directing, the body straight, which could then thus be followed even if your body isn't straight.

- Is used by those travelling in the air. It is a strong image, flying through the air sitting crosswise but here I am reminded of the story of the flying carpet; it isn't that a rug or carpet would here then not make sense. And in this scenario the pāḷi uses the instrumental form.

- Shelters the knees from the rain. Sitting crosswise would then have to protect the knees from getting wet. The knees are a weak spot and having them protected from rain and cold by means of folding some cloth to tuck them in would seem to make sense. The covering function reminds me of sermon AN3.63 where the exalted one collected some grasses and leaves into a pile and then "sat down on it folding his legs crosswise", which can also be read as having folded a cover (over that pile) in order to make a cushion to sit on.

More and more pallaṅka seems to me as if it could be related to some kind of mat, rug, cover. It is found in a combination with animal skin (e.g. hair vāla removed from a pallaṅka). Yet a spread, rug, mat is santhata, a sitting cloth. Then again, a sitting cloth functions as a cover. There is an example of a body covered with veins and also a pallaṅka covered with a woollen rug, thus the sitting cloth as cover (santhata) fits well. Suppose you don't have a sitting cloth but a friend lends your one so you both can have your own seats. Then when asked if that is your seat, you could answer this by saying that it is your seat but not your sitting cloth. And if you would clean it and hang it to dry, it is the sitting cloth (santhata) that hangs and not the seat (pallaṅka). It is in this way that I look at their relation.

Thus a cloth can be folded to also protect the knees, it can be spread over a pile of leaves to fold a cushion, it can be folded to get some difference in height for hips and knees. All in all I think that 'folding a seat' could make sense. Then, putting it grammatically in the same form as it is used in pāḷi and without using sitting cross-legged we could get:

'Here, almsmen, an almsman gone to a forest, or gone to the foot of a tree, or gone to an empty home, having folded a seat he sits down...'

In this way the instruction doesn't need to say you must sit cross-wise. Which doesn't mean you can't sit 'cross-wise' but if you do perhaps do so for the right reasons. Perhaps you don't need to damage your legs thinking you must sit in a certain way, perhaps you don't need to train to sit this way to impress or take it as a measurement of improvement and perhaps you don't need to feel unable to follow 'that sitting instruction'; what if you even don't have two legs to begin with.

So, I think an alternative, without the instruction to sit cross-legged, can be made. This doesn't mean the translation as cross-legged is wrong, I have no way of knowing, but as I see some benefit with the use of this version I'll, for the time being, be using this one instead.

Ariyasāvaka

Ariyasāvaka is often found translated as noble disciple.

It is a compound formed with the words ariya and sāvaka. Ariya is said to refer to the generally approved and esteemed customs and ideals of the Aryan clans, covering the racial, social and ethical aspects translated as noble and sāvaka as disciple.

Noble disciple seems to indicate the disciple as the noble one, but note that for an arahant 'sāvaka' is used, not ariyasāvaka, which makes this a little odd. It ironically also seem to make some people wonder who exactly is when noble.

Another rendering is disciple of the noble one(s). At least here people can be disciples without worrying about their status as nobility, but again for the arahant sāvakā is used. Thus if for the arahant noble falls off then it is a bit odd to refer to them as noble ones.

Both translations leave some oddness by trying to assign 'noble' to a certain person. But noble here stood for the social and ethical direction. So it is about the learning/following the good, the highest, righteousness, of all of those traits for which aryan stood example. And for this generalization we get to use nobleness instead. A monastic is not a noble one, a virtous one is not a noble one, the exalted one is not a noble one, and the dhamma is not noble (after all there are unwholesome dhammā) but nobleness is and noble principles are.

So then, disciple of nobleness? But what exactly would that mean? The word disciple implies a certain relationship with nobleness and since nobleness is an abstract word it makes this to ambiguous. Then lets look at sāvaka as well. The dictionary says:

> Sāvaka [fr. śru] a hearer, disciple.

And with hearer we don't have the problem as with disciple. It also has a long standing relation with oral traditions so that seems to fit. Then for ariyasāvaka we have 'hearer of nobleness' (as in hearer of the good). Even when the exalted ones' words are long time gone, one can set certain things as nobler, higher, not to admire but to advance to. Advancing this way keeps siding with the good. And when the dhamma is discovered then it is set as the new highest. So as principle it seems to fit as well.

The ariyasāvaka and arahant are both sāvakā (hearers; hearers of the exalted one). Since the arahant is done with going, siding, that direction towards the good does not apply. This way it can be understood why an arahant is then not an ariyasāvaka.

Ariyasāvaka is a compound of which we made the two part clear. We have removed an assumed person from being assigned to as noble and we have removed an assumed person from being assigned to having disciples. And this has nothing to do with regarding someone as noble or regarding someone having disciples, it is just that this is not what this is here about. Now noble is inclined for nobleness; again it is not a person who is noble but rather the nobleness of what is noble. And of what is noble that a hearer get to be educated about. As compound 'hearer of what is noble' fits grammatically as well, a bahubbīhi compound may require the addition of a pronoun. So now with the problems gone and making sense both grammatically and in meaning we can use either 'hearer of nobleness' or 'hearer of what is noble'. Both say the same but perhaps the least abstract version makes it even more clear.

> Ariya (adj. --- n.) noble.
> ---sāvaka hearer of what is noble.

Sutta

Sutta is often translated as discourse.

Before we start, here is not a problem to fix, no misunderstanding involved, and in that sense it is a bit odd to place it in Transicalities. But it is the closest fitting place. Discourse is to me more an interpretation than a translation and I noticed that in speech I mostly kept using sutta instead.

A sutta is according to the dictionary a thread, amongst other things, and it is by its usage that it is translated as discourse, dialogue, text, scripture. A funny thing is that recently I heard someone speak about a thread, as to start or be involved in conversation, and its meaning was understood. I assume it is because of internet discussion forums, emails, and so on where messages and replies are grouped named threads. And if this is already so used in everyday speech I feel quite comfortable to use it here then too.

> Sutta (nt.) thread.

PART III. Threads

Arising of View

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Dukanipātapāḷi
Tatiyapaṇṇāsakaṃ

AN2.126

'These are the two, almsmen, supports for the arising of wrong view. Which two? And the proclamation from others, and improper attention. Now these are, almsmen, the two supports for the arising of wrong view.'

AN2.127

'These are the two, almsmen, supports for the arising of right view. Which two? And the proclamation from others, and proper attention. Now these are, almsmen, the two supports for the arising of right view.'

Calm and Insight

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Dukanipātapāḷi
Paṭhamapaṇṇāsakaṃ
AN2.32

'These two, almsmen, principles have a share in knowing. What two?
And calm and insight.

Calm, almsmen, when developed, what gain does it partake in?
Mind is developed.

Mind developed; what gain does it partake in?
What passion is, that is gotten rid of.

Insight, almsmen, when developed, what gain does it partake in?
Wisdom is developed.

Wisdom developed; what gain does it partake in?
What not-knowing is, that is gotten rid of.

Or, depraved by passion, almsmen, mind is not emancipated,
or, depraved by not-knowing, wisdom is not developed.

Thus now, almsmen,
with passion fading: emancipation by mentality,
with not-knowing fading: emancipation by wisdom.'

Cessation of Action

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Saḷāyatanasaṃyuttaṃ
Kammanirodhasuttaṃ
SN35.146

'I shall point out, almsmen, old-and-new action, cessation of action, and the way leading to cessation of action. Therefor listen, pay attention well, I shall speak.

And which, almsmen, old action?

Eye is, almsmen, to be seen as old action; arranged, intended, to be felt ...pe... Tongue is, almsmen, to be seen as old action; arranged, intended, to be felt ...pe... Intellect, almsmen, to be seen as old action; arranged, intended, to be felt. This is called, almsmen, old action.

And which, almsmen, new action?

Now what, almsmen, action one does at present by body, by speech, by intellect. This is called, almsmen, new action.

And which, almsmen, cessation of action?

Now what, almsmen, touches emancipation by cessation of action-by-body, action-by-speech, action-by-intellect. This is called, almsmen, cessation of action.

And which, almsmen, the way leading to cessation of action?

Just this noble eightfold path viz. right view, right attitude, right speech, right doing, right way of life, right effort, right recollection, right concentration. This is called, almsmen, the way leading to cessation of action.

Thus now, almsmen, taught, by me, is old action, taught is new action, taught is cessation of action, taught is the way leading to cessation of action.

Now what, almsmen, should be done by a teacher for the welfare of the hearers, with mercy, out of mercy, is therefor done by me for you. These are, almsmen, roots of trees, these are empty places. Radiate, almsmen, don't be negligent, don't become remorseful afterwards. This is our instruction to you.'

Characteristics

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Tikanipātapāḷi
Saṅkhatalakkhaṇasuttaṃ

AN3.47

'These three are, almsmen, the inclined characteristics of the inclined [1]. Which three? Arising is known, passing is known, alteration when stood is known. Now these are, almsmen, the three inclined characteristics of the inclined.'

AN3.48

'These three are, almsmen, the uninclined characteristics of the uninclined. Which three? No arising is known, no passing is known, no alteration when stood is known. Now these, almsmen, are the three uninclined characteristics of the uninclined.'

---

N o t e s

1. Inclined characteristics, so each of them has these three characteristics too, etc., etc., etc.

Concise on Emptiness

Majjhima Nikāya
Uparipaṇṇāsapāḷi
Suññatavaggo
Cūḷasuññatasuttaṃ
MN121

So I learned:

At one time the exalted one he dwells in the eastern park, at Migāramātupāsāda, at Sāvatthi. Now then senior Ānanda at evening time returned from seclusion, went by there where the exalted one was. Having gone up to the exalted one, saluted, he sat down at one side. At one side seated now senior Ānanda said this to the exalted one:

'At this one time, venerable, the exalted one he dwells amongst the Sakyans at a market town of the Sakyans, named Nagaraka. There I, venerable, learned face to face, received face to face from the exalted one: 'By dwelling by emptiness I, Ānanda, at present dwell a lot'. I hope this is by me, venerable, well learned, well grasped, well attended to, well retained?'

'Surely you got this, Ānanda, well learned, well grasped, well attended to, well retained. I formerly also, Ānanda, also at present, by dwelling by emptiness I dwell a lot. As therefor also, Ānanda, this Migāramātupāsāda is empty of elephants, cows, horses and meres, empty of gold and silver, empty of female and male assemblies and so this is the non-emptiness, which is the generalization depending on the order of almsmen. Just so now, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the village, not attending to the perception of men, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the forest. For him on the perception of the forest the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the village, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of men, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the forest.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the village the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of men the perception is gone' , 'And so this is the non-emptiness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the forest'. So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness [1].

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of men, not attending to the perception of the forest, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the earth. For him on the perception of the earth the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. As therefor also, Ānanda, a bull's hide, well spread by a hundred pegs, is having the folds gone away, thus so then, Ānanda, an almsmen which of this earth's highs and lows, rivers with difficult passages, places with stumps and thorns, irregular rocks, therefor not attending to all; he pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the earth. For him on the perception of the earth the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of men here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the forest, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the earth.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of men the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the forest the perception is gone', 'And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the earth.' Thus now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the forest, not attending to the perception of the earth, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-sky. For him on the perception of the base of boundless-sky the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the forest here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the earth, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-sky.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the forest the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the earth the perception is gone', 'And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-sky.' So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the earth, not attending to the perception of the base of boundless-sky, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition. For him on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the earth here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of boundless-sky, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the earth the perception is gone ', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of boundless-sky the perception is gone', 'And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition.' So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the base of boundless-sky, not attending to the perception of the base of boundless-cognition, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the base of non-ownership. For him on the perception of the base of non-ownership the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of boundless-sky, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of non-ownership.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of boundless-sky the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of boundless-cognition the perception is gone', 'And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of posessionlessness.'

So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the base of boundless-cognition, not attending to the perception of the base of non-ownership, pays attention to the generalization depending on the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. For him on the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of boundless-cognition, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of non-ownership, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.' He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of boundless-cognition the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of non-ownership the perception is gone', 'And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is the generalization depending on the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.' So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the base of non-ownership, not attending to the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, pays attention to the generalization depending on the signless mental-concentration. For him on the signless mental-concentration the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of non-ownership, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is just this body depending on the hexad-base support for life'. He knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of non-ownership the perception is gone', knows: 'This is empty; from the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception the perception is gone', 'And so this is the non-emptiness, which is just this body depending on the hexad-base support for life.' So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clear entry into emptiness.

And further following, Ānanda, an almsmen not attending to the perception of the base of non-ownership, not attending to the perception of the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, pays attention to the generalization depending on the signless mental-concentration. For him on the signless mental-concentration the mind jumps at, reconciles, settles, is drawn to. So he knows: 'Now also this signless mental-concentration is arranged, intended', knows: 'But now anything what is arranged, intended, that is unstable; the principle of cessation'. For him thus from knowing, thus from seeing, and the mind emancipated from the drain of lust, and the mind emancipated from the drain of existence, and the minded emancipated from the drain of not-knowing, upon emancipation, thus emancipated, the knowledge is. He knows: 'Exhausted is birth, fulfilled is the divine life, done is what ought to be done, no further for such a state'. So he knows: 'What might be the wearinesses depending on the drain of lust, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the drain of existence, here those are not. What might be the wearinesses depending on the drain of not-knowing, here those are not. And so this is the moderation of weariness, which is just this body depending on the hexad-base support for life.' He knows: 'This is empty from the drain of lust', knows: 'This is empty from the drain of existence', knows: 'This is empty from the drain of not-knowing, And so this is the non-emptiness, which is just this body depending on the hexad-base support for life.' So now for what is not there by that, therefor, he sees emptiness, yet what is left there therefor he knows: 'Soothed this is'. Thus also for him this, Ānanda, exists being as it is; the undistorted clean, furthest and unsurpassed entry into emptiness.

Also for whatever, Ānanda, in past durations, recluses and divine men obtaining the clean, the furthest and unsurpassed emptiness, they all dwelt obtaining just this clean, furthest and unsurpassed emptiness. Also what for, Ānanda, in times to come, recluses and divine men, obtaining the clean, the furthest and unsurpassed emptiness, they all will dwell obtaining just this clean, furthest and unsurpassed emptiness. Also what for, Ānanda, at present, recluses and divine men, obtaining the clean, the furthest and unsurpassed emptiness, they all dwell obtaining just this clean, furthest and unsurpassed emptiness. Thus from that here, Ānanda,

'We shall dwell obtaining the clean, the furthest and unsurpassed emptiness' for so by you guys, Ānanda, it should be trained.'

Thus spoke the exalted one.

---

N o t e s

1. Here is shown the method by emptying where with proper attention right view follows going all the way up to right concentration (the drawn into, settling) indicating the practise of the whole noble eightfold path. It describes calm (samatha) and insight (vipassanā), all in a way known and affirmed by oneself (undistorted, clear). If through this we get to experience that calmness and understanding, we then have obtained for ourselves a nice atmosphere to dwell in. And thus can we speak of dwelling in emptiness, and thus can we speak of an entry into emptiness as well. [Back]

Consumed

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Khandhasaṃyuttaṃ
Khajjanīyasuttaṃ
SN22.79

Situated at Sāvatthi.

'For whatever, almsmen, or recluses or divine man remembering various prior abodes, they remember all these five masses-with-grasping together or they remember certain.

Which five?

Or 'with such form I was in past durations' thus, almsmen, for the remembrance he remembers just the form, or 'with such feeling I was in past durations' thus, almsmen, for the remembrance he remembers just the feeling, or 'with such perception I was in past durations' thus, almsmen, for the remembrance he remembers just the perception, or 'with such inclinations I was in past durations' thus, almsmen, for the remembrance he remembers just the inclinations, or 'with such cognition I was in past durations' thus, almsmen, for the remembrance he remembers just the cognition.

And what, almsmen, would they say is form?

Now thus it deforms, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'form'. Deforms with what? Deforms with cold, deforms with heat, deforms with hunger, deforms with thirst, deforms with gadfly, mosquito, wind, sun, contact with the creeping. Now it thus deforms, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'form'.

And what, almsmen, would they say is feeling?

Now thus it feels, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'feeling'. And what it feels? Happiness it feels, suffering it feels, neither suffering nor happiness it feels. Now it thus feels, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'feeling'.

And what, almsmen, would they say is perception?

Now thus it perceives, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'perception'. And what it perceives? Also dark it perceives, also yellow it perceives, also red it perceives, also light it perceives. Now thus it perceives, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'perception'.

And what, almsmen, would they say are inclinations?

Now thus they incline the inclined, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'inclinations'. And what are the inclined they incline? form for the form-ness is the inclined they incline, feeling for the feeling-ness is the inclined they incline, perception for the perception-ness is the inclined they incline, inclinations for the inclination-ness is the inclined they incline, cognition for the cognition-ness is the inclined they incline. Now thus they incline the inclined, almsmen, from that it is to be called 'inclinations'.

And what, almsmen, would they say is cognition?

Now thus it cognizes, almsmen, for that it is to be called 'cognition'. And what it cognizes? Also sour it cognizes, also bitter it cognizes, also sharp it cognizes, also sweet it cognizes, also soapy it cognizes, also not-soapy it cognizes, also salty it cognizes, also bland it cognizes. Now thus it cognizes, almsmen, for that it is to be called 'cognition'.

There, almsmen, having learned, a hearer of what is noble considers thus:

> 'Now, I am presently consumed with form,
> for periods in the past I was consumed with form just so.
> As therefor also presently I am consumed with the current form.
> Now, and like I would welcome yet the future form, > for periods in the future I also would be consumed with form just so.
> As therefor also presently I am consumed with the current form.'

Thus considering he has no expectation in future form. He does not welcome future form. He opposed, by disenchantment, by fading, by cessation, to the current form.

> > Idem with feeling, perception, inclinations, cognition.

Therefor, what do you deem almsmen, is form or stable or unstable?'

'Unstable, venerable.'

'What is yet unstable is it therefor or sufferable or happy?'

'Sufferable, venerable.'

'What is yet unstable, sufferable, a principle of change for the worse, is it therefor okey to see: 'This is me, this I am, this is my self?''

'Of course not, venerable.'

> Idem with feeling, perception, inclinations, cognition.

'Therefor this, almsmen, 'whatever form, past, future, current, or internal or external, or gross or subtle, or low or high, what is in the distant or in the near, all the form is essentially with right wisdom similarly to be seen as 'Not this is me, not this I am, not this is my self'.

> Idem with feeling, perception, inclinations, cognition.

This is called, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble who decreases, not increases; who renounces, not grasps; who turns from, not turns to; who disperses, not congregates.

And what does he decreases, not increases? Form he decreases, not increases. Feeling he decreases, not increases. Perception he decreases, not increases. Inclinations he decreases, not increases. Cognition he decreases, not increases.

And what does he renounces, not grasps? Form he renounces, not grasps. Feeling he renounces, not grasps. Perception he renounces, not grasps. Inclinations he renounces, not grasps. Cognition he renounces, not grasps.

And what does he turns from, not turns to? Form he turns from, not turns to. Feeling he turns from, not turns to. Perception he turns from, not turns to. Inclinations he turns from, not turns to. Cognition he turns from, not turns to.

And what does he disperses, not congregates? Form he disperses, not congregates. Feeling he disperses, not congregates. Perception he disperses, not congregates. Inclinations he disperses, not congregates. Cognition he disperses, not congregates.

Seeing so, almsmen, having learned, a hearer of what is noble gets fed up also on form, gets fed up also on feeling, gets fed up also on perception, gets fed up also on inclinations, gets fed up also on cognition. Fed up, he lacks interest. By the fading of passion he is to be emancipated. Upon emancipation, thus emancipated, the knowledge is. He knows 'Birth is barren, the divine life fulfilled, done what ought to be done, no more further state of being'. This is called, almsmen, the almsmen who neither increases nor decreases.

Stood having decreased, he neither renounces nor grasps. Stood having renounced, he neither turns from nor turns to. Stood having turned from, he neither disperses nor congregates. He stood having dispersed.

And what does he neither increases nor decrease?

Stood having decreased form, he neither increases nor decreases it. Stood having decreased feeling… perception… inclinations… cognition, he neither increases nor decreases it. He stood having decreased.

And what does he neither renounces nor grasps?

Stood having renounced form, he neither renounces nor grasps it. Stood having renounced feeling… perception… inclinations… cognition, he neither renounces nor grasps it. He stood having renounced.

And what does he neither turns from nor turns to?

Stood having turned from form, he neither turns from nor turns too it. Stood having turned from feeling… perception… inclinations… cognition, he neither turns from nor turns to it. He stood having turned from.

And what does he neither disperses nor congregates?

Stood having dispersed form, he neither disperses not congregates it. Stood having dispersed feeling… perception… inclinations… cognition, he neither disperses nor congregates it. He stood having dispersed.

Now with the mind so emancipated, almsmen, deities grouped with Inda, grouped with Brahma, grouped with Pajāpati, like from far, they hail the almsman:

> Hail you thoroughbred man, hail you highest man.
> Of what you rely on, also what radiates,
> we are not familiar with.

'

Exertion of Restraint

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Catukkanipātapāḷi
Paṭhamapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Caravaggo
Saṃvarasuttaṃ
AN4.14

'These four, almsmen, exertions.

Which four?

- exertion of restraint.
- exertion of rejection.
- exertion of development.
- exertion of preservation.

And which, almsmen, exertion of restraint?

Here, almsmen, an almsman, seeing a form by eye, is not a holder of signs nor a holder of details by reason of which there to, the strength of the eye abiding unrestrained, he would befall to avarice and distress, evil, unwholesome principles. To restrain that he goes against, he guards against, the strength of the eye. The strength of the eye undergoes the restraint. Hearing a sound by ear … re .. Smelling a scent by nose … re … Tasting a taste by tongue … re … Touching a tangible by body … re … Knowing a principle by intellect, is not a holder of signs nor a holder of details by reason of which there to, the strength of the intellect abiding unrestrained, he would befall to avarice and distress, evil, unwholesome principles. To restrain that he goes against, he guards against, the strength of the intellect. The strength of the intellect undergoes the restraint. This is called, almsmen, exertion of restraint.

And which, almsmen, exertion of rejection?

Here, almsmen, an almsman does not give in, get rids of, dispels, destroys, annihilates arisen lustful thoughts. … re … arisen angry thoughts … re … arisen cruel thoughts … re … does not give in, gets rid of, dispels, destroys, annihilates whichever arisen evil, unwholesome principles. This is called, almsmen, exertion of rejection.

And which, almsmen, exertion of development?

Here, almsmen, an almsman develops the awakening factor of recollection, bent on seclusion, bent on fading, bent on cessation, resulting in relinquishment ... re ... the awakening factor of investigation into principles ... re ... the awakening factor of vigour ... re ... the awakening factor of joy ... re ... the awakening factor of calmness ... re ... the awakening factor of concentration ... re ... the awakening factor of neutrality, bent on seclusion, bent on fading, bent on cessation, resulting in relinquishment. This is called, almsmen, exertion of development.

And which, almsmen, exertion of preservation?

Here, almsmen, an almsman preserves an arisen auspicious sign for concentration: the perception of a skeleton, the perception of a maggot infested cadaver, the perception of a discoloured cadaver, the perception of a festering cadaver, the perception of a fissured cadaver, the perception of a bloated cadaver. This is called, almsmen, exertion of preservation.

These now are, almsmen, the four exertions.'

> 'Restraint and rejection and development and preservation
> these four exertions are taught by the Kinsman of the Sun
> by which the here ardent almsman, > ought to attain the passing away of suffering.'

Forerunner

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Ekakanipātapāḷi
Accharāsaṅghātavaggo

AN1.56

'Whatever, almsmen, principles, unwholesome, have a share in the unwholesome, are siding with the unwholesome,
all those have the intellect going prior.
Intellect is for those principles the first to arise,
just along the unwholesome principles.'

AN1.57

'Whatever, almsmen, principles, wholesome, have a share in the wholesome, are siding with the wholesome,
all those have the intellect going prior.
Intellect is for these principles the first to arise,
just along the wholesome principles.'

Graspable

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Khandhasaṃyuttaṃ
Upādāniyasuttaṃ
SN22.121

Situated at Sāvatthi.

'I shall point out, almsmen, and the graspable principles and the grasping. Therefor listen.

And which, almsmen, graspable principles, which grasping?

Form, almsmen, a graspable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping. Feeling, almsmen, a graspable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping. Perception, almsmen, a graspable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping. Inclinations, almsmen, a graspable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping. Cognition, almsmen, a graspable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping.

These are called, almsmen, graspable principles, this the grasping.'

---

N o t e s

- Pointed out are graspable principles and the grasping, which is present with the desire and passion present. So it is not: grasping forms, etc. (nor is there grasping without forms, etc.) but 'with desire and passion for forms, grasping'; With support of longing, grasping. And it is said like this 'what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the grasping', so if there is no desire and passion, then there is no grasping; With the cessation of longing, cessation of grasping. Thus dependent-co-arising, the right way.

One Principle

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Mahāvaggo
Ānāpānasaṃyuttaṃ
Ekadhammavaggo
Ekadhammasuttaṃ
SN54.1

Situated at Sāvatthi.

Now there ... pe ... said this:

'One principle, almsmen, when developed, when made much of, is great of fruit, great of benefit. Which one principle?

Recollection on the in and out breathe.

And from developed how, almsmen, from made much of how, is the recollection on the in and out breathe great of fruit, great of benefit?

Here, almsmen, an almsman gone to a forest or gone to the root of a tree, or gone to an empty home, having folded a seat he sits down, directing the body straight, peripherally attending the recollection.

He either recollected breathes in, or recollected breathes out.

Either while breathing in long he knows: 'long I breathe in', or while breathing out long he knows: 'long I breathe out'.
Either while breathing in short he knows: 'short I breathe in', or while breathing out short he knows: 'short I breathe out'.

'While experiencing the whole body I shall breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while experiencing the whole body I shall breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While relaxing the inclinations [1] for the body I shall breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while relaxing the inclinations for the body I shall breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While experiencing pleasantness I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while experiencing pleasantness I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While experiencing happiness I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while experiencing happiness I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While experiencing the inclinations for the mind I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while experiencing the inclinations for the mind I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While relaxing the inclinations for the mind I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while relaxing the inclinations for the mind I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While experiencing the mind I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while experiencing the mind I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While settling the mind [2] I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while settling the mind I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While emancipating the mind I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while emancipating the mind I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While considering the unstableness I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while considering the unstableness I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While considering fading I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while considering fading I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While considering cessation I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while considering cessation I breathe out' — he trains himself.

'While considering relinquishment I breathe in' — he trains himself,
'while considering relinquishment I breathe out' — he trains himself.

Thus from developed now, almsmen, recollection on the in and out breathe, thus from made much of, it is great of fruit, great of benefit.'

N o t e s

1. Perhaps you might have heard people advise someone to relax and a reply follows as 'but how can I relax?' which gets answered by 'just relax'. Thus relax to relax? And here it is made more clear, relax the inclinations which then will lead to a relaxed body and mind; Relax the breathe and the body will become relaxed, relax feelings and perceptions and mind will get relaxed. [Back]

2. After relaxing, the mind nestles or sinks in, which is the settling of the mind. [Back]

Penetrative

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Chakkanipātapāḷi
Dutiyapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Mahāvaggo
Nibbedhikasuttaṃ
AN6.63

'I shall point out to you, almsmen, a penetrative exposition on an exposition of principles. Therefor listen, pay attention well, I shall speak.'

So now those almsmen replied to the exalted one:

'Venerable'

The exalted one said this:

'And what is that, almsmen, penetrative exposition on the exposition of principles?

Lusts, almsmen, should be known. Of lusts the situation for arising should be known, of lusts the difference should be known, of lusts the ripening should be known. The cessation of lusts should be known. The way leading to the cessation of lusts should be known.

Feelings, almsmen, should be known. Of feelings the situation for arising should be known, of feelings the difference should be known, of feelings the ripening should be known. The cessation of feelings should be known. The way leading to the cessation of feelings should be known.

Perceptions, almsmen, should be known. Of perceptions the situation for arising should be known, of perceptions the difference should be known, of perceptions the ripening should be known. The cessation of perceptions should be known. The way leading to the cessation of perceptions should be known.

Drains, almsmen, should be known. Of drains the situation for arising should be known, of drains the difference should be known, of drains the ripening should be known. The cessation of drains should be known. The way leading to the cessation of drains should be known.

Action, almsmen, should be known. Of actions the situation for arising should be known, of actions the difference should be known, of actions the ripening should be known. The cessation of action should be known. The way leading to the cessation of action should be known.

Suffering, almsmen, should be known. Of suffering the situation for arising should be known, of suffering the difference should be known, of suffering the ripening should be known. The cessation of suffering should be known. The way leading to the cessation of suffering should be known.'

'Lusts, almsmen, should be known. Of lusts the situation for arising should be known, of lusts the difference should be known, of lusts the ripening should be known. The cessation of lusts should be known. The way leading to the cessation of lusts should be known', now thus this yet was said:

'And what was this said depending on? These five, almsmen, strings to lust: Forms to be cognized by eye; wished for, lovable, charming, dear forms to be dyed connected with lusts. Sounds to be cognized by ear... Scents to be cognized by nose... Tastes to be cognized by tongue... Tangibles to be cognized by body; wished for, lovable, charming, dear forms to be dyed connected with lusts. But even now, almsmen, these are not the lusts, in the discipline of what is noble they are called this name 'strings to lust'.

> Passional attitude is mans' lust.
> Not these are the lusts, what are the colourings in the world.
> Passional attitude is mans' lust.
> The colourings they stand in the world just so,
> but here the firm they discipline desire.

And what is, almsmen, of lusts the situation for arising? Touch is, almsmen, of lusts the situation for arising. And what is, almsmen of lusts the difference? Another is, almsmen, lust upon forms, another is lust upon sounds, another is lust upon scents, another is lust upon tastes, another is lust upon tangibles. This is called, almsmen, of lusts the difference. And what is, almsmen, of lusts the ripening? What now, almsmen, lusting like this, like that, a being produces or a share in merit, or a share in demerit. This is called, almsmen, of lusts the ripening. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of lusts? Cessation of touch is, almsmen, the cessation of lusts. Just this noble eightfold path leading to the cessation of lusts is the way, viz. right view, right attitude, right speech, right doing, right way of life, right effort, right recollection, right concentration, from which, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows lusts. Thus knows of lusts the situation for arising, thus knows of lusts the difference, thus knows of lusts the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of lusts. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of lusts. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of lusts. 'Lusts, almsmen, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of lusts should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Feelings, almsmen, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of feelings should be known', now thus this yet was said:

'And what is this said depending on? These three, almsmen, feelings: happy feelings, sufferable feelings, neither happy nor sufferable feelings. And what is, almsmen, of feelings the situation for arising? Touch is, almsmen, of feelings the situation for arising. And what is, almsmen of feelings the difference? It is, almsmen, happy feeling of the flesh, it is happy feeling not of the flesh, it is sufferable feeling of the flesh, it is sufferable feeling not of the flesh, it is neither happy nor sufferable feeling of the flesh, it is neither happy nor sufferable feeling not of the flesh. This is called, almsmen, of feelings the difference. And what is, almsmen, of feelings the ripening? What now is, almsmen, being felt like this, like that, a being produces or a share in merit, or a share in demerit. This is called, almsmen, the ripening of feelings. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of feelings? Cessation of touch is, almsmen, the cessation of feelings. Just this noble eightfold path leading to the cessation of feelings is the way, viz. right view ... pe ... right concentration, from where now, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows feelings. Thus knows of feelings the situation for arising, thus knows of feelings the difference, thus knows of feelings the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of feelings. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of feelings. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of feelings. 'Feelings, almsman, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of feelings should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Perceptions, almsmen, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of perceptions should be known', now thus this yet was said:

'And what depending on was it said? These six, almsmen, perceptions: perception of forms, perception of sounds, perception of scents, perception of tastes, perception of tangibles, perception of principles. And what is, almsmen, of perceptions the situation for arising? Touch is, almsmen, of perceptions the situation for arising. And what is, almsmen, of perceptions the difference? Another is, almsmen, perceptions upon forms, another is perceptions upon sounds, another is perceptions upon scents, another is perceptions upon tastes, another is perceptions upon tangibles, another is perceptions upon principles. This is called, almsmen, of perceptions the difference. And what is, almsmen, of perceptions the ripening? Fully ripening in expression is, almsmen, perception I say. In whatever way one perceives, like that one expresses: 'Thus I perceived'. This is called, almsmen, of perception the ripening. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of perceptions? Cessation of touch is, almsmen, the cessation of perceptions. Just this noble eightfold path leading to the cessation of feelings is the way, viz. right view ... pe ... right concentration, from where now, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows perception. Thus knows of perceptions the situation for arising, thus knows of perceptions the difference, thus knows of perceptions the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of perceptions. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of perceptions. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of perceptions. 'Perceptions, almsman, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of perceptions should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Drains, almsmen, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of drains should be known' was said, now thus this yet was said:

'And what depending on was it said? These three, almsmen, drains: the drain of lust, the drain of existence, the drain of not-knowing [1]. And what is, almsmen, of drains the situation for arising? Not-knowing is, almsmen, of drains the situation for arising. And what is, almsmen, of drains the difference? It is the drain that led one to go to hell, it is the drain that led one to go to the animal domain, it is the drain that led one to go to the realm of ghosts, it is the drain that led one to go to the world of humans, it is the drain that led one to go to the world of deities. This is called, almsmen, of drains the difference. And what is, almsmen, of drains the ripening? What now, almsmen, is coming from not-knowing, like this, like that, a being produces or a share in merit, or a share in demerit. This is called, almsmen, of drains the ripening. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of drains? Cessation of not-knowing is, almsmen, the cessation of drains. Just this noble eightfold path is the way leading to the cessation of drains, viz. right view ... pe ... right concentration, from where now, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows drains. Thus knows of drains the situation for arising, thus knows of drains the difference, thus knows of drains the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of drains. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of drains. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of drains. 'Drains, almsman, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of drains should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Action, almsmen, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of actions should be known' was said, now thus this yet was said:

'And what depending on was it said? Intentionally is, almsmen, action I say. Intending the action, one does by body, by speech, by intellect. And what is, almsmen, of actions the situation for arising? Touch is, almsmen, of actions the situation of arising. And what is, almsmen, of actions the difference? It is, almsmen, action to be felt in hell, it is action to be felt in the animal domain, it is action to be felt in the ghost realm it is action to be felt in the human world, it is action to be felt in the deity world. This is called, almsmen, of actions the difference. And what is, almsmen, of actions the ripening? In three ways is, almsmen, of actions the ripening I say. Just seen in principle, in the rise, or in the follow up, or in the departure [2]. This is called, almsmen, of actions the ripening. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of actions? Cessation of not-knowing is, almsmen, the cessation of actions. Just this noble eightfold path is the way leading to the cessation of actions, viz. right view ... pe ... right concentration, from where now, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows actions. Thus knows of actions the arising, thus knows of actions the difference, thus knows of actions the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of actions. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of actions. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of actions. 'Actions, almsman, should be known ... pe ... The way leading to the cessation of actions should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Suffering, almsmen, should be known. Of suffering the situation for arising should be known, of suffering the difference should be known, of suffering the ripening should be known. The cessation of suffering should be known. The way leading to the cessation of suffering should be known', now thus this yet was said:

'And what was this said depending on? Also birth is sufferable, also oldness is sufferable, also sickness is sufferable, also death is sufferable, also grief, lamentation, suffering, distress, unrest are sufferable, also wishing what one not acquires that also is sufferable [3]. In short, the five masses with grasping are sufferable. And what is, almsmen, of suffering the situation for arising? Longing is, almsmen, of suffering the situation for arising. And what is, almsmen, of suffering the difference? It is, almsmen, extreme suffering, it is little suffering; it is slow in fading, it is quick in fading. This is called, almsmen, of suffering the difference. And what is, almsmen, of suffering the ripening? Here, almsmen, where someone overwhelmed by suffering, with the mind exhausted, grieves, distresses, laments, beats the chest, bewails, gets into confusion, or where yet overwhelmed by suffering, with the mind exhausted, gets into a quest outside: 'Who knows a verse or two for this suffering's cessation?' Fully ripening in confusion, a cartload is, almsmen, suffering I say, or fully ripening in quest. This is called, almsmen, of suffering the ripening. And what is, almsmen, the cessation of suffering? Cessation of longing is, almsmen, the cessation of suffering. Just this noble eightfold path leading to the cessation of suffering is the way, viz. right view, right attitude, right speech, right doing, right way of life, right effort, right recollection, right concentration, from which, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble: Thus knows suffering. Thus knows of suffering the situation for arising, thus knows of suffering the difference, thus knows of suffering the ripening. Thus knows the cessation of suffering. Thus knows the way leading to the cessation of suffering. He knows that the penetrative divine life is the cessation of suffering. 'Suffering, almsmen, should be known. Of suffering the situation for arising should be known, of suffering the difference should be known, of suffering the ripening should be known. The cessation of suffering should be known. The way leading to the cessation of suffering should be known', thus therefor what was said, depending on this here it was said.'

'Now this it is, almsmen, a penetrative exposition on an exposition of principles.'

N o t e s

1. A drain (āsava) drains, and leads to a lower destination. [Back]

2. Diṭṭheva dhamme upapajje vā apare vā pariyāye. With the previous 'of actions the difference' in mind, ripening is in principle seen: In the rise (at a destination; e.g. born in the human-world, country, family), In the follow up (at that destination; given the same circumstances beings don't need to evolve the same), In the departure (from that destination; some die very old of which some say they must have been doing something good in a previous life; it is this kind of ripening what is then looked at). [Back]

3. Because the universals such as birth, etc. are reliable to suffering, thus sufferable, suffering should be known. [Back]

Successive Cessations

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Navakanipātapāḷi
Paṭhamapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Sattāvāsavaggo
Anupubbanirodhasuttaṃ
AN9.31

'These are nine, almsmen, successive cessations. Which nine?

- First radiance, when engaged in, lust perception has ceased.
- Second radiance, when engaged in, thoughts and thinking have ceased.
- Third radiance, when engaged in, pleasantness has ceased.
- Forth radiance, when engaged in, breathing in and breathing out have ceased.
- Base of boundless-sky, when engaged in, perception of form has ceased.
- Base of boundless-cognition, when engaged in, perception of the base of boundless-sky has ceased.
- Base of non-ownership, when engaged in, perception of the base of boundless-cognition has ceased.
- Base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, when engaged in, perception of the base of non-ownership has ceased.
- Cessation of perceptions and feelings, when engaged in, and perceptions and feelings have ceased.

These now are, almsmen, nine successive cessations.'

Suffering

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Nidānasaṃyuttaṃ
Dukkhasuttaṃ
SN12.43

At Sāvatthi.

... pe ...

> 'Of suffering, almsmen, I shall point out and the rise, and the disappearance. Therefor listen, pay attention well, I shall speak.'

So now those almsmen replied to the exalted one:

> 'Venerable'

The exalted one he said this:

> 'And which is, almsmen, of suffering the rise?
>
> Depending on and the eye and forms, arises the eye-cognition. The going together of the three is the touch. With support of touch, feeling. With support of feeling, longing. This now, almsmen, is of suffering the rise.
> Depending on and the ear and sounds, arises the ear-cognition ... pe.. Depending on and the nose and scents ... pe ... Depending on and the tongue and tastes ... pe ... Depending on and the body and to be touched ... pe ... Depending on and the intellect and principles, arises the intellect-cognition. The going together of the three is the touch. With support of touch, feeling. With support of feeling, longing. This now, almsmen, is of suffering the rise.
>
> And which is, almsmen, of suffering the disappearance?
>
> Depending on and the eye and forms, arises the eye-cognition. The going together of the three is the touch. With support of touch, feeling. With support of feeling, longing. Just like that, with complete fading and cessation of longing, cessation of grasping. With cessation of grasping, cessation of existence. With cessation of existence, cessation of birth. With cessation of birth, oldness-and-death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, unrest cease. So for this entire mass of suffering the cessation is. This now, almsmen, is of suffering the disappearance.

Depending on and the ear and sounds ... pe.. Depending on and the nose and scents ... pe ... Depending on and the tongue and tastes ... pe ... Depending on and the body and to be touched ... pe ... Depending on and the intellect and principles, arises the intellect-cognition. The going together of the three is the touch. With support of touch, feeling. With support of feeling, longing. With complete fading and cessation of just this longing, cessation of grasping. With cessation of grasping, cessation of existence. With cessation of existence, cessation of birth. With cessation of birth, oldness-and-death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, distress, unrest cease. So for this entire mass of suffering the cessation is. This now, almsmen, is of suffering the disappearance.'

The First on Existence

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Tikanipātapāḷi
Dutiyapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Ānandavaggo
Paṭhamabhavasuttaṃ
AN3.77

Now then senior Ānanda approached there where the exalted one was. Approaching the exalted one, saluting, he sat down at one side. Now seated at one side, senior Ānanda said this to the exalted one:

''Existence, existence', venerable, it is said.
Now then in what respect, venerable, existence is?'

'And in regard to the aspect of lust and ripening, Ānanda, if not existed the action then now on to existence with lust, could it be distinguished?'

'Of course not, venerable.'

'Now here, Ānanda, is action the field, cognition the seed, longing the moisture. Not-knowing the obstructions, for beings with yokes of longing for the lower aspects cognition found support. Thus is in the future the production of a following existence.

And in regard to the aspect of form and ripening, Ānanda, if not existed the action then now on to existence with form, could it be distinguished?'

'Of course not, venerable.'

'Now here, Ānanda, is action the field, cognition the seed, longing the moisture. Not-knowing the obstructions, for beings with yokes of longing for the medium aspects cognition found support. Thus is in the future the production of a following existence.

And in regard to the aspect of formlessness and ripening, Ānanda, if not existed the action then now on to existence without form, could it be distinguished?'

'Of course not, venerable.'

'Now here, Ānanda, is action the field, cognition the seed, longing the moisture. Not-knowing the obstructions, for beings with yokes of longing for the higher aspects cognition found support. Thus is in the future the production of a following existence.

Now so, Ānanda, existence is.'

The Mass

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Mahāvaggo
Saccasaṃyuttaṃ
Dhammacakkappavattanavaggo
Khandhasuttaṃ
SN56.13

'These four, almsmen, noble truths.

Which four?

- Suffering; a noble truth.
- Rise of suffering; a noble truth.
- Cessation of suffering; a noble truth.
- The way leading to cessation of suffering; a noble truth.

And which, almsmen, Suffering; a noble truth?

'The five-masses-with-grasping' is to this to be answered; viz. the mass-of-form-with-grasping, the mass-of-feeling-with-grasping, the mass-of-perception-with-grasping, the mass-of-inclinations-with-grasping, the mass-of-cognition-with-grasping. This is called, almsmen, suffering; a noble truth.

And which, almsmen, Rise of suffering; a noble truth?

The going on of longing, accompanied by joy and passion welcoming this and that, pertaining to further existence; viz. the longing for lust, the longing for existence, the longing for non-existence. This is called, almsmen, rise of suffering; a noble truth.

And which, almsmen, Cessation of suffering; a noble truth?

What just like that, with the complete fading and cessation of longing, is the giving up, the forsaking, the release, the doing away with. This is called, almsmen, cessation of suffering; a noble truth.

And which, almsmen, The way leading to cessation of suffering; a noble truth?

This very noble eightfold path; viz. right view, right attitude, right speech, right doing, right way of life, right effort, right recollection, right concentration. This is called, almsmen, the way leading to cessation of suffering; a noble truth.

Now these are, almsmen, four noble truths. Therefore, almsmen, ' This; suffering' is the effort to be made. 'This; rise of suffering' is the effort to be made. 'This; cessation of suffering' is the effort to be made. ' This; the way leading to cessation of suffering' is the effort to be made.'

The Spike

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Saḷāyatanavaggo
Vedanāsaṃyuttaṃ
Sagāthāvaggo
Sallasuttaṃ
SN36.6

'Not having learned, almsmen, a commoner feels also a happy feeling, feels also a sufferable feeling, feels also a neither-sufferable-nor-happy feeling. Having learned, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble feels also a happy feeling, feels also a sufferable feeling, feels also a neither-sufferable-nor-happy feeling. In this, almsmen, what is the distinction, what is the peculiarity, what is making the difference for a learned hearer of what is noble with a not learned commoner?'

'Rooted in the exalted one are our, venerable, principles ... pe ...'

'Not having learned, almsmen, a commoner being touched by a sufferable feeling grieves, is in misery, wails, beats the chest, laments, meets with bewilderment. He feels two feelings: and a bodily and a mental. As therefor also, almsmen, a man would be pierced with a spike. That with this, along the piercing, he would be pierced by a second spike. Because so, almsmen, that man feels the feeling by two spikes. Just so now, almsmen, not having learned a commoner being touched by a sufferable feeling grieves, is in misery, wails, beats the chest, laments, meets with bewilderment. He feels two feelings: and a bodily and a mental. Just like that, yet now being touched by a sufferable feeling; resistance is. That with this, with sufferable feeling, resistance; what to sufferable feeling the tendency for resistance is, that lies dormant. He, being touched by a sufferable feeling, welcomes the happiness by lust.

Therefor, what is the reason?

For he doesn't, almsmen, know. A commoner has not learned the going out of sufferable feeling other than from happiness by lust. For that he has been pleased with happiness by lust and what to happy feeling the tendency for passion is, that lies dormant. He essentially not knows 'and the rise', 'and the setting', 'and the sweetness', 'and the wretchedness', 'and the going out' of those feelings. For he essentially not understood 'and the rise', 'and the setting', 'and the sweetness', 'and the wretchedness', 'and the going out' of those feelings, what to neither-sufferable-nor-happy feeling the tendency for not-knowing is that lies dormant. That if happiness is the feeling he feels, he feels this linked. If suffering is the feeling he feels, he feels this linked. If neither-suffering-nor-happiness is the feeling he feels, he feels this linked. This is called, almsmen, a commoner who has not learned: linked 'with birth', 'with oldness', 'with death', 'with sorrows', 'with lamentations', 'with sufferings', 'with distresses', 'with unrests'; 'linked from suffering' I say.

Yet now having learned, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble being touched by a sufferable feeling grieves not, is not in misery, wails not, not beats the chest, laments not, not meets with bewilderment; he feels one feeling: bodily, not mental. As therefor also, almsmen, a man would be pierced with a spike. That with this, after piercing, he would not be pierced by a second spike. Because so, almsmen, that man feels the feeling by one spike. Just so now, almsmen, having learned a hearer of what is noble being touched by a sufferable feeling grieves not, is not in misery, wails not, not beats the chest, laments not, not meets with bewilderment; he feels one feeling: bodily, not mental. Just like that yet now being touched by a sufferable feeling; resistance is not. That with this, with sufferable feeling, no resistance; what to sufferable feeling the tendency for resistance is, that does not lie dormant. He, being touched by a sufferable feeling, does not welcome the happiness by lust.

Therefor, what is the reason?

For he does, almsmen, know. A hearer of what is noble has learned the going out of sufferable feeling other than from happiness by lust. For that he has not been welcoming the happiness by lust; what to happy feeling the tendency for passion is, that does not lie dormant. He essentially knows: 'and the rise', 'and the setting', 'and the sweetness', 'and the wretchedness', 'and the going out' of those feelings. For he essentially understood 'and the rise', 'and the setting', 'and the sweetness', 'and the wretchedness', 'and the going out' of those feelings, what to neither-sufferable-nor-happy feeling the tendency for not-knowing is that does not lie dormant. That if happiness is the feeling he feels, he feels this unlinked. If suffering is the feeling he feels, he feels this unlinked. If neither-suffering-nor-happiness is the feeling he feels, he feels this unlinked. This is called, almsmen, a hearer of what is noble who has learned: unlinked 'with birth', 'with oldness', 'with death', 'with sorrows',

'with lamentations', 'with sufferings', 'with distresses', 'with unrests'; 'unlinked from suffering' I say.

This now is, almsmen, the distinction, this is the peculiarity, this is making the difference for a learned hearer of what is noble with a not learned commoner.'

The wise feels no feeling, also a happy one,
also a sufferable one, he is very learned indeed.
And this, of the steadfast with a commoner,
is the great distinction of wholesomeness.

For the very learned, of the inclined principle,
clearly seen is this world and beyond.
For pleasant principles not shake the mind,
from the unpleasant no resistance comes.

For those compliances and/or non-compliances are scattered, they are gone; not 'they are'.
Acquainting the path and the stainless, sorrowless,
he rightly knows the going beyond of existence.

The Three Characteristics

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Tikanipātapāḷi
Saṅkhatalakkhaṇasuttaṃ

AN3.47

'These three are, almsmen, the inclined characteristics of the inclined [1]. Which three? Arising is known, passing is known, alteration when stood is known. Now these are, almsmen, the three inclined characteristics of the inclined.'

AN3.48

'These three are, almsmen, the uninclined characteristics of the uninclined. Which three? No arising is known, no passing is known, no alteration when stood is known. Now these, almsmen, are the three uninclined characteristics of the uninclined.'

---

N o t e s

1. Inclined characteristics, so each of them has these three characteristics too, etc., etc., etc.

To be Concluded

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Devatāsaṃyuttaṃ
Upanīyasuttaṃ
SN1.3

Situated at Sāvatthi.

Standing apart now that deity said in presence of the exalted one this verse:

> 'It is to be concluded, life is short-lived.
> Concluded to oldness, no shelters exist.
> Considering this fear in death,
> one should make merits bearing happiness.'

[The exalted one]

> 'It is to be concluded, life is short-lived.
> Concluded to oldness, no shelters exist.
> Considering this fear in death,
> appeasement is to be looked for in giving up the world's bait.'

To be Seen as

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Vedanāsaṃyuttaṃ
Daṭṭhabbasuttaṃ
SN36.5

'These three, almsmen, feelings. Which three? Feelings from happiness, feelings from suffering, feelings from neither happiness nor suffering.

Feelings from happiness, almsmen, are to be seen as from suffering. Feelings from suffering are to be seen as from a spike. Feelings neither from happiness nor from suffering are to be seen as from unstableness.

Now from what, almsmen, is to an almsman the feeling from happiness, it is seen from suffering. The feeling from suffering, it is seen from a spike, The feeling neither from happiness nor from suffering, it is seen from unstableness. This is called, almsmen, an almsmen rightly seeing. He cut out longing, turned down the yoke, by right comprehension of esteem he made an end of suffering.'

What is happiness he saw from suffering, suffering he saw from a spike, neither happiness nor suffering being, he saw as from unstableness.
That surely is a rightly seeing almsmen, he understands feelings.

He, the feelings understanding, sees in principle the drainless.
After the breaking-up of the body, the principle gained,
the attainer of the highest knowledge, can not come to reckoning.

Two Happinesses

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Dukanipātapāḷi
Dutiyapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Sukhavaggo
AN2.66

'These are two, almsman, happinesses. Which two?

And happiness by lust, and happiness by renunciation.
These now are, almsmen, two happinesses.

This the summit, almsmen, of these two happinesses,
which is happiness by renunciation.'

Yokeable

Saṃyutta Nikāya
Khandhavaggo
Khandhasaṃyuttaṃ
Dhammakathikavaggo
Saṃyojaniyasuttaṃ
SN22.120

Situated at Sāvatthi.

'I shall point out, almsmen, and the yokeable principles and the yoke. Therefor listen.

And which, almsmen, yokeable principles, which yoke?

Form, almsmen, a yokeable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the yoke. Feeling, almsmen, a yokeable principle; what there the desire and passion is, therefor there the yoke. Inclinations, almsmen, a yokeable principle; what there the desire and passion, therefor there the yoke. Cognition, almsmen, a yokeable principle; what there the desire and passion, therefor there the yoke.

These are called, almsmen, yokeable principles; this the yoke.'

---

N o t e s

- See Graspable.

Yokes

Aṅguttara Nikāya
Dasakanipātapāḷi
Paṭhamapaṇṇāsakaṃ
Nāthavaggo
Saṃyojanasuttaṃ
AN10.13

'These ten are, almsmen, yokes. Which ten?

The yokes, five with a share in the downward;
The yokes, five with a share in the upward.

Which yokes are the five with a share in the downward?

- view of embodiment
- unclarity
- superstition
- lustful desire
- anger

These yokes are the five with a share in the downward.

Which yokes are the five with a share in the upward?

- passion for form
- passion for formlessness
- esteem
- agitation
- not-knowing

These yokes are the five with a share in the upward.

These now are, almsmen, the ten yokes.'

PART IV. Glossary

Glossary

| PALI | ENGLISH |
|---|---|
| ājīva | way of life |
| ākiñcañña | non-ownership |
| anattā | not self |
| anicca | unstable |
| aññāṇa | ignorance |
| arahant | virtuous one |
| ariyasāvaka | hearer of what is noble |
| āsava | drain |
| avijjā | not-knowing |
| āvuso | friend |
| āyasma | senior |
| bhante | venerable (used by junior almsmen towards seniors and by lay towards almsmen and wanderers/ascetics from other sects) |
| bhava | existence |
| bhāvanā | development |
| bhikkhā | alms |
| bhikkhu | almsman |
| bhikkhunī | almswoman |
| bhuddha | awakened; awakened one |
| bhūta | essence (from esse 'be': become, ghost, being, result of becoming) |
| byāpāda | anger |
| ceto | mentality |
| cetanā | intention |
| chandarāgo | desire and passion |
| citta | mind |
| cittassa ekaggataṃ | focus of mind (=concentration) |
| dhamma | principle |
| dhātu | aspect |

| | |
|---|---|
| dosa | hate |
| dukkha | suffering |
| ekaggatā | focus |
| jhāna | radiance |
| kamma | action |
| kāma | lust |
| kāmacchanda | lustful desire |
| kāya | body |
| khandha | mass |
| lobha | greed |
| māna | esteem |
| manasi karoti | pay attention to |
| manasikāra | attention |
| mano | intellect |
| manosañcetanā | willpower (one of the foods to carry on) |
| micchā | wrong |
| moha | delusion |
| ñāṇa | knowledge |
| nāmarūpa | name-and-form |
| nibbāna | peace |
| nidāna | situation |
| nimitta | sign |
| nīvaraṇa | obstruction |
| paccaya | support |
| pañc'upādānakkhandhā | five masses-with-grasping |
| parimukha | peripheral |
| paṭigha | resistance (as in friction) |
| phala | fruit |
| phassa | touch |
| punabbhava | following existence |
| rāga | passion |
| sakkāya | embodiment |
| sakkāyadiṭṭhi | the view of embodiment |

| | |
|---|---|
| saḷāyatana | hexad base (ṣaḍ° ordinarily chal°: see cha (=six); ṣaḍ reminds of hextad (hĕk′săd′); hexad or sextet, indicating a group of six) |
| samādhi | concentration |
| sammā | right |
| sampajañña | awareness (mindfulness, consciousness) |
| saṃyojana | yoke |
| saññā | perception |
| suññatā | emptiness |
| saṅkappa | attitude |
| saṅkhāra | inclination |
| sati | recollection |
| sīla | conduct |
| sīlabbata | conduct and practise |
| sīlabbataparāmāsa | superstition |
| somanassa | contentment |
| taṇhā | drought, thirst; fig. longing, craving |
| thera | elder (vs senior: an elder is more looked upon for guidance with wisdom and a senior is more used about the position in an organisation. One can be a elder without being senior, AN2.38) |
| thinamiddha | dullness |
| uddhacca | agitation |
| uddhaccakukkucca | remorse |
| vedanā | feeling |
| vicāra | thinking |
| vicikiccā | unclarity |
| viññāṇa | cognition |
| vipāka | ripening |
| vipariṇāma | change for the worse |
| vipassanā | insight |
| vitakka | thought |